Frequently Asked Questions:

- Do I have to talk directly to the customer or can I leave a voicemail for an appointment reminder call?
  - We would like to make every effort to speak to the customer directly so that we can ensure they don't have other needs that need to be met. For example, say peer calls customer and customer doesn't answer. He leaves a voicemail stating "hey customer, wanted to remind you of your appointment tomorrow. I know transportation has been an issue recently, so I wanted to confirm you had a ride for tomorrow. If you don't, please let me know asap and we can try to arrange a ride." Peer then follows up with customer after appointment to check on how things went, etc. Leaving a voicemail and not following up afterwards is not best practice.
- Do the OHH care team's efforts to re-engage a customer in OHH services count as a service?
  - The care team's efforts to re-engage a customer does not fall into one of the core health home services. Simply calling the customer to re-engage them, for example, would not fall under one of the six core health home services. If you are providing a health home service but do not necessarily contact that patient, that would count (such as appointment making assistance or referral tracking). Maintaining contact with the customer would also count as long as you make contact with them either in-person or telephonically to support one of the qualified health home services (such as care coordination).
- If another member of the agency coordinates care for the client, does this count as a service?
  - No. OHH services must be completed by members of the OHH team. However, if the other member of the agency then informs the OHH team about their care coordination, that would be considered a service, as the team is now coordinating care with the other agency member.
- If I am unable to meet with a customer directly, can I leave resource paperwork for them at our front desk?
  - Yes. Time was spent gathering information for the customer's need, which would fall into the guidelines of care coordination. For example, a customer is struggling with food insecurity so you gather paperwork about food pantries to leave at the front desk for customer to get when they are at the agency next. While you may not be working directly with the customer, you are working on one of the core OHH services (referral to community and social supports) for that customer. Best practice would be to follow up with the customer, whether in person or via phone to ensure they received the paperwork and if they needed any additional support in regards to the paperwork.
